

Before our phone number was added to the no call list, our phone would ring all the time. Since it has been added, the house has felt like a home instead of a place of business. If banks have a reason for call, so be it. However, giving them the right to call as much as they want is in total contradiction to the privacy list and would be a step backwards. I have business relations with banks and credit cards. They have no reason to call me and I don't want to hear from them. All the junk mail I get is bad enough, I don't need junk phone calls, too.
